Jocelyn Elders, a Surgeon General under Bill Clinton was taken to task for not informing the public that condoms distributed by the government of Arkansas were found to be defective. Her response was that "she didn't want people to lose faith in condoms," as that would cause more harm than faulty condoms. I wondered at the time who or what she was really worried about harming. Was it the government's and ultimately her reputation, or was she concerned about the reputation of condoms? She surely wasn't worried about the people who had received the condoms. Why are we still required to wear cloth masks when we know that they are not effective? Why is there such reluctance to acknowledge natural immunity, which many studies have shown it to be highly effective and longer lasting than the "vaccine?" I personally believe we are experiencing a similar situation as we did in the 90s. The government and its agents don't want us to lose faith in what they say and have been saying, despite the mounting evidence. Sadly, just like in the 90's, I believe they are putting people they purport to help at risk in order to save face. Those who have faith in masks can continue to wear them. Those who don't shouldn't be forced to do so.
